Being a “nice guy” is good for improving one’s odds in romance

Word count: 382

When it comes to dating, there can be many different approaches that people take to court their partners. The success rates of these approaches vary, as people react differently to certain approaches based on their personalities. The “nice guy” approach has numerous advantages and perks over other approaches in long-term romance, but this doesn’t necessarily mean that it trumps other approaches in every circumstance. People who use this approach will usually be very chivalrous and respectful. The parents of their partner will likely be pleased with the attitude of the nice guy, and approve of him as a potential in-law. There will likely be fewer arguments and problems between the couple, and any problems that do arise can be solved quickly. As such, I argue that being a nice guy is beneficial in improving one’s odds in romance.

The attitude of a nice guy in dating will usually be very chivalrous. This creates a comfortable and respectful environment for his partner, making her feel relaxed and appreciated. His partner can tell how much he cares for her, and based on his actions, she can rest assured that he is not likely to hurt her in any way. This sets the tone for subsequent dates, making her more inclined to continue seeing the nice guy.

If the nice guy meets his partner’s parents, they will likely appreciate his respectfulness with their daughter. Parents want to see that their daughter will be well taken care of, and the qualities that the nice guy displays can assure them that he is willing and capable of doing this. Additionally, the nice guy will be able to get along well with his partner’s parents, and establish more meaningful bonds with them. This is because they can see that he cherishes their daughter a lot, so they will be more open and accepting towards him as well.

A nice guy is better able to solve any problems that may arise with his partner. He is more likely to consider and respect his partner’s opinions, and be unselfish in finding solutions. Creating this kind of atmosphere in problem-solving will help draw them closer, instead of pushing them apart. This will strengthen their bond, as any obstacles can be overcome efficiently, paving the way to a longer and healthier relationship.
